.Cornell University has agreed to pay a $1 million settlement to two men who were victims of abuse while they were students at the Ivy League school. The two men say they were groomed and sexually abused during what Cornell called a “re-education” program. The settlement between the men and the school was announced in an online statement by the Office of Institutional Sexual Assault and Sexual Violence Prevention on Wednesday. The statement, sent to the Cornell Daily Sun, said the settlement had been reached in principle and that a lawsuit is pending. According to the statement, a third man also accused of sexual misconduct was involved in the settlement, but he was not a student at Cornell. The statement said the settlement was the result of talks between the men’s lawyers and Cornell’s lawyers. In the statement, a lawyer for one of the men, Gerald Robbins, wrote that the settlement was not related to any charges against another of the men, Adam Green. The other man who had a settlement with Cornell, David Kasper, has refused to talk about the matter with the media. The statement said that Mr. Robbins, Mr.

Kasper and the unnamed man had experienced similar experiences that began when they were students at Cornell and that they “were repeatedly coerced into performing sexual acts as part of a re-education program at Cornell University.” The program was called “Life Education.” It was started in the mid-1990s, before Mr. Green graduated in 1999. Mr. Robbins graduated in 2003. When I interviewed Senator Sherrod Brown for my book, “Trumped,” I asked him if there was a single issue that he thinks would be a deal-breaker for voters—and a deal-breaker for Republicans, too. Mr. Brown answered in the affirmative. “If you go to someone and say: ‘Let’s agree that we’re going to tax the rich, we’re going to spend money on things like education, we’re going to try and reduce income inequality, we’re going to try and clean up the environment—what if we fail at any of those things?’” he told me. “That could happen. But it doesn’t mean that the public is going to like them.” That’s what I think the Republican Party did to Donald Trump. Because he spent 82157476af
